A DUST STORM AT SEA.
A few strange sea changes are recorded on the log of the British tramp steamship Manuka, which arrived yesterday from Batoum, on the Black Sea. Having many different sorts of water to navigate, the Manuka naturally had a larger chance to have things happen to her than a straightaway Atlantic liner, limited to one ocean. The queer incidents began in the Black Sea, ran through the sea of Marmora, the Dardanelles, the Mediterranean and finally into the Atlantic.

The Manuka left Batoum on March 2. She got a sleet storm in the Black Sea and a snowstorm or two in the sea of Marmora and the Dardanelles. It was tumultuous when she entered the Mediterranean. South of Sicily, while the ship was rolling and pitching in a heavy sea and there was a brisk wind, a fine red dust, powder like, began to fall on the Manuka's decks. It set the whole ship's company coughing.

Capt. H. T. Bovey, who has been a nautical nomad forty years, had never heard of a dust storm at sea. He thought that the choking dust it kept up from 5 o'clock on the afternoon of March 5 until next morning.

At one time the dust was so thick and suffocating that all hands were forced to lie in their bunks. The skipper says he thinks it came from some volcano in Sicily or the islands thereabouts. It was so thick on the ship's decks and superstructure that the men amused themselves writing their names and sentiments smacking of the vigor of the sea on everything exposed to the storm's influence.

The Manuka had more gales, mostly ahead, after she passed Gibraltar and entered the Atlantic. Her coal was nearly gone when she was about 300 miles west of Fayal, one of the Azores, and she decided to put back, Bermuda, the next coaling port, being more than 1,000 miles away. She coaled and sailed again. On the sixth day out she ran into an electrical storm which decorated her trucks with St. Elmo's fire. Just after this manifestation, thirteen waterspouts, following one another in Indian file, and pirouetting from southwest to northeast, raced across her course, about two miles away. They were vapory monsters, some apparently more than a mile tall, and were going at tornado speed. Thereafter the trip was normal. The cargo of the Manuka consists wholly of licorice root and yarn.—N. Y. Sun.

WHEN A MAN STOPS JUMPING.
"Henry," she said, and there were what a novelist would call tears in her voice as she spoke, "I don't believe you love me."
He took the cigar from his mouth and looked at her in surprise over the top of his newspaper.
"Maria," he said, "don't be foolish."
"There," she exclaimed, "There's evidence of the truth of what I said. 'Don't be foolish!' Did you ever speak to me that way before we were married?"
"No, my dear, I did not," he admitted.
"Then," she said reproachfully, "my slightest wish was law; then you never sat like a dummy, smoking a cigar and reading a paper, when I was in the room; then you seemed anxious to please me; and were ever on the watch to do some little favor for me."
"It is true," he admitted.
"You were never lazy then," she went on, "You were full of life and spirit; you were energetic."
"My dear," he interrupted, in that calm, dispassionate tone that makes the average wife want to get a poker or a broom, "did you ever see a poker trying to get an apple or a cherry that was just a little out of his reach?"
"Certainly," she answered, "but—"
"He keeps jumping and jumping until he gets it," he said.
"Of course," she said.
"But does he continue jumping after he has got it?"
"Certainly not, there's no need of it."
"Well," he said, as he turned to his paper again, "you are my cherry, and I don't see the slightest reason why I should keep on jumping, any more than the boy."
